The original palette has 24 colors, but when I open it with open_palette() I get only 20. The importance of the bioinspired study of collagenous tissues has been recognized by several groups of investigators, but only recently has the macromolecular assembly of type I collagen, which constitutes most of the organic material of connective tissues, begun to receive closer scrutiny by the scientific community. This research proposal takes the view that the information thus far revealed about the spatial organization of collagen molecules has been confirmed, but our understanding of the detailed molecular organization of collagen and collagen-containing macromolecular aggregates and fibers has yet to be developed in a sufficient manner to permit a meaningful model. Specifically, we propose to use complementary approaches (X-ray diffraction, electron crystallography, fluorescence microscopy, and selective enzymatic degradation) to examine the organization of collagen molecules within native collagenous tissue and in fiber precursor structures. We will test the hypothesis that approximately 100 collagen molecules are arranged in a tandem helical superstructure in all three dimensions in the crystalline lattice of type I collagen fibers. This arrangement produces a spool-like subunit, which is itself in turn rolled up to form the triple helix of the native collagen molecule
